Obtaining the learning results proposed in this Guide requires the completion of training activities active and varied supported by methodologies also diverse in which the role of the student is relevant.

For this reason, students are offered training activities directed and controlled by the teacher, dynamic activities of cooperation between the teacher and his students and autonomous learning activities that the student will develop alone following the guidelines given by the teacher. To make it easier for our students to achieve learning outcomes envisaged in this Guide, we opted for methodological pluralism, in order to promote the greater involvement of students, the attention to the diversity of learning styles and the generation of richer learning outcomes, to the extent that each type of methodology particularly favors the acquisition of concrete learning results and the development of specific skills and abilities

In principle, the teaching delivery methodology is expected to pivot around face-to-face classes. However, according to the decision adopted on July 14 by the Grade Quality Assurance Commission, the course will be taught in person.
